TRANSLATION NOTES

The character the succubus draws on the guy's forehead on page 3 is one you've probably seen fairly often in other series. (肉 ← that one). It stands for "meat" (pronounced "niku") and the joke of writing it on people's foreheads while they sleep is typically attributed to an old fighting manga series caled Kinnikuman where the main character, also named Kinnikuman, has that kanji on his forehead. This main character's inteligence is not the greatest, to say the least. He is essentially the embodiment of a meat head, and that's what the joke of writing the kanji on someone's head essentially means (i.e calling someone stupid, usually for falling asleep while others are awake).

Of course the succubus didn't think the joke was enough and so she wrote a second character underneath it to make 肉欲 (pronounced "nikuyoku") which means lust and is obviously much more succubus-like!

Sometimes people write kanji that are on the foreheads of other Kinnikuman main characters as well like 米, 中 and 骨.

There are also plenty of vartions on this prank like writing the kanji 牛 (cow, pronounced "ushi") because there's a Japanese saying that you'll turn into a cow if you sleep before you eat.
